"In the current state of affairs, many African countries have ignored the benefits of the concept and the double-edged sword of the concept of the commons to their environmental protection and development," he says. "I truly believe that dialogue is the only way to get out of the vicious cycle of tensions and negative stereotypes." Kigutha enlisted the assistance of South Africa's Department of Environmental Affairs, which helped set up meetings between South Africa's government and Namibia's FOSS leaders. "We started at the top of the hierarchy. After that it is down to the Ministry of Sustainable Development," Kigutha says. "We did not want to just have the Minister of Sustainable Development. So, we wanted to get the Deputy Minister of Environment and one of the ministry's specialties. He went to Namibia and met with the Minister, to build working partnerships." Kigutha says it was important for the government to show that Namibia is serious about the ecosystem. "The day-to-day conservation practice is much more important than the regulatory bodies," he says. "We want to see the effort of the government's day-to-day practice toward the objectives of conserving the aquatic biosphere of the country." Kiguth
